PREFACE

The introduction of science and technology through colonialism penetrated every nook and corner of the country, bringing transformation in all spheres of life. The social, political, economic, and especially the cultural life of the people found new expressions - often shadowed by the fear of losing tradition. Bangalore, now evolved into a cosmopolitan city, still bears visible traces of its colonial past. The rule of the Governor Generals under British administration has left indelible imprints on the city's infrastructure - from architectural edifices, educational institutions, to parks and palaces, and cultural life. The amalgamation of the East and the West is distinctly reflected in the life and rhythm of Bangaloreans.

This Special Journal on "Colonial Legacy: Governor Generals' Contribution to the Development of Bangalore" revisits the colonial period and its influence in shaping Bangalore through an academic lens. The articles in this volume shed light on the conflict between power and progress, and their impact on the city's development across various sectors. The transformation of Bangalore from a traditional pete to a cosmopolitan metropolis underwent several dynamic phases of modernisation. The contributions in this issue attempt to capture that journey - not in glorification of the colonial era, but in critical reflection on its far-reaching consequences.

I express my profound gratitude to all scholars and contributors whose insightful writings have enriched this compilation; to the editor and review team for their meticulous efforts; and to the Internal Quality Assurance Cell (IQAC), the Organising Secretary, and the ever-supportive faculty members for their constant encouragement in bringing this special issue to fruition.
